APPEAL FROM DECISION OF MEDICAL APPEAL TRIBUNAL ON A QUESTION OF LAW DECISION OF A TRIBUNAL OF SOCIAL SECURITY COMMISSIONERS

Name: [redacted] (Mrs) on behalf of [redacted] (Child)

Medical Appeal Tribunal: Manchester

Original Decision Case No: M/154/4/85

Application for leave Case No: M/239/9/85

[ORAL HEARING]

1. For the reasons hereinafter appearing, the decision of the medical appeal tribunal given on 14 June 1985 is erroneous in point of law and accordingly we set it aside. We direct that the appeal be reheard by a differently constituted tribunal who will have regard to the matters mentioned below.

2. On Form MY1, received by the Secretary of State on 10 May 1984, a claim for mobility allowance was made by Mrs. [redacted] on behalf of her son, [redacted]. The history of that claim is set out in the written submissions of the Secretary of State dated 8 November 1985 and there is no merit in repeating such history here. Suffice it to say that the claimant contends that the tribunal of 14 June 1985 erred in point of law and seeks to have their decision set aside. In view of the uncertainty as to the effect of the House of Lords decision in Lees v. The Secretary of State for Social Services [1985] 1 A.C. 930 on the law as set out in Decision R(M) 2/78, the Chief Commissioner appointed a Tribunal of Commissioners to consider the present case and a further appeal on Commissioner's file CM/39/1984, which involved the same branch of the law. In the event we heard both cases together at an oral hearing at which Mr. R Drabble of Counsel from the Free Representation Unit appeared on behalf of the claimants in both appeals, and Mr I B Glick of Counsel, instructed by the Solicitor's Office of the Department of Health and Social Security, represented the Secretary of State. We are indebted to both of them for their submissions.

3. In brief, Mr Drabble's contention was that the House of Lords decision had not affected anything that was said in R(M)2/78 and that the principles of that particular decision still applied. Moreover, he was supported in this by Mr Glick whose submissions were in all substantial points identical with those of Mr Drabble. For the reasons set out below we accept their contentions.

4. In R(M)2/78 the question at issue was whether or not a boy, who suffered from mongolism but was physically capable of walking, might nevertheless bring himself within the terms of regulations 37(A) of the Social Security Act 1975 as it was then enacted. Section 37A then provided as follows:-

37A (1) - Subject to the provisions of this section, a person who satisfies prescribed conditions as to residence or presence in Great Britain shall be entitled to a mobility allowance for any period throughout which he is suffering from physical disablement such that he is either unable to walk or virtually unable to do so.

- (2) Regulations may prescribe the circumstances in which a person is or is not to be treated for the purposes of this section as suffering from such physical disablement as is mentioned above.....

At that time the Mobility Allowance Regulations 1975 had been made and regulation 3 provided as follows:-

"(1) A person shall only be treated, for the purposes of section 37A, as unable to walk or virtually unable to do so, if his physical condition as a whole is such that, without having regard to circumstances peculiar to that person as to place of residence or as to place of, or nature of employment, -

- (a) he is unable or virtually unable to walk; or
(b) the exertion required to walk would constitute a danger to his health or would be likely to lead to a serious deterioration in his health.

(2) A person shall not be treated, for the purposes of section 37A, as unable to walk or virtually unable to do so if he is able to walk with a prosthesis or an artificial aid which he habitually wears or uses or if he would be able to walk if he habitually wore or used a prosthesis or an artificial aid which is suitable in his case."

Although the boy concerned was capable of walking in the sense of placing one foot in front of the other, the medical appeal tribunal nevertheless considered that he was virtually unable to walk. They put the matter as follows:-

"We agree that the boy is suffering from mongolism a condition which is due to faulty genetic inheritance and can therefore be classified as a physical disorder. We accept the evidence that while he walks for some yards he is liable to run, stop, lie down and refuse to go further; this reaction which seriously impairs mobility is directly due to the physical condition of mongolism."

In other words, although the boy was capable of running, let alone walking, nevertheless from time to time by reason of a condition, which was due to a physical disablement, he suffered, as far as walking was concerned, temporary paralysis. The Chief Commissioner upheld the medical tribunal's approach. He observed as follows:-

"17. The medical appeal tribunal recorded a decision and a finding in terms that Robert was unable to walk or virtually unable to do so because of physical disablement, the condition from which he suffered being a physical disorder. They found that physical condition was directly responsible for 'reaction' which seriously impaired his mobility. No doubt it was open to the medical appeal tribunal to have decided that what effectively prevented Robert from exercising any physical ability to walk was attributable to a mental state, stemming from but operating independently of any disabling physical condition. They did not do so. In so far as there was any mental element which prevented Robert from walking (he has an accepted mental age of 2 years) they attributed his virtual inability, not to conscious volition or mental disability, but to "reaction" itself directly due to his physical condition. I read their decision as concluding that a physical factor was present throughout in the causation of his inability to walk."

It is important to note that the Chief Commissioner made a sharp distinction between a refusal to walk which was attributable to a conscious choice on the part of the person concerned and an inability to walk which was attributable to a physical disorder. He went on to observe:-

"...whether the medical criteria are met in a particular case is for the medical authorities to determine, and clearly there are borderline and difficult cases where the expertise of the medical authorities will be decisive one way or the other. For example, there may be cases of claimants suffering from a physical disorder such as Down's Syndrome whose legs are capable of the physical movements of walking, but who are prevented by other aspect of their physical condition from making use of them; or cases of the mentally handicapped who 'choose' not to walk, to be compared with the mentally handicapped who have never learned to walk. Undoubtedly there will be hard cases where the facts will permit of different medical inferences and conclusions."

5. Regulation 3 of the Mobility Allowance Regulations 1975 was subsequently amended. However, prior to a change in the regulation a proposed draft was brought to the attention of the National Insurance Advisory Committee, and that body issued a report dated 24 January 1979. As is clear from that report, the purpose of the proposed amendment was to "clarify the issues" raised by R(M)2/78. In paragraph 6 of the report the Committee

b. ed as follows:-

"6. The Chief Commissioner in his decision indicated that the weight to be attached to physical and mental disablement where both factors may be present is for the medical adjudicating authorities to decide. The Department have told us that, after taking into account legal and medical advice, they subsequently concluded that the amending regulations should relate to the effect of a disabling condition, rather than its causation.

7. We see no reason to dissent. None of the representations we received took exception to such an approach and one or two positively supported it."

It is clear from these observations and from what was elsewhere said in the report that the principles set out in R(M)2/78 were not the subject matter of criticism. All that was being attempted was to expand the phrase "virtually unable to walk", so as to enable the adjudicating authorities to have some statutory guidance as to the factors to be taken into account. In the event, the regulation was amended so as to read as follows:-

"(1) A person shall only be treated, for the purposes of section 37A, as suffering from physical disablement such that he is either unable to walk or virtually unable to do so, if his physical condition as a whole is such that, without having regard to circumstances peculiar to that person as to place or residence or as to place of, or nature of, employment -

- (a) he is unable to walk: or
- (b) his ability to walk out-of doors is so limited, as regards the distance over which or the speed at which or the length of time for which or the manner in which he can make progress on foot without severe discomfort, that he is virtually unable to walk; or
- (c) the exertion required to walk would constitute a danger to his life or would be likely to lead to serious deterioration in his health."

6. Unfortunately, thereafter, certain decisions of Commissioners introduced a gloss on the relevant statutory provisions. In R(M)2/81 it was held that a claimant who was blind and also suffered from a physical disablement in his balance mechanism and sense of direction, so that it was impossible for him to control the direction in which he wished to move, albeit it was accepted that he was physically capable of walking, could nevertheless be regarded as unable to walk within the meaning of regulation 3. Moreover the ability or inability of the person concerned to control the direction in which he went was also held to be a material consideration in a later decision, this time by a Tribunal of Commissioners, R(M)1/83. However, this gloss was firmly repudiated by the House of Lords in the Lees decision. There the facts were substantially the same as those of R(M)2/81. The claimant was completely blind and also suffered from some hydrocephalus with symptoms including impairment of balance and impairment of capacity for spacial orientation. Outdoor walking was only possible with the help of an adult guide to pilot her and it had proved impossible to substitute a guide dog to assist her. She could not move from point A to point B by herself. The claim for mobility allowance was rejected by the Commissioner, and later by the Court of Appeal, and their approach was upheld by the House of Lords. Lord Scarman concluded his opinion with the following observations:-

"The House was referred to a number of decisions given by Social Security Commissioners on the point of law raised in this appeal, from which it is clear that the question has given rise to differences of opinion. I am satisfied that Mr Rice, the Commissioner who heard this case, reached the correct conclusion in law and that other decisions which differ from his on the law must be held to be to that extent erroneous. Mr Rice considered that, had the legislature intended to include in regulation 3(1)(b) the inability to direct one's walking, it would have done so in clear terms and he went on to say:

[Blindness] is an affliction which is wholly unrelated to the physical power to move one leg in front of another. Of course, it affects drastically the sufferer's scope for walking, in that, outdoors at least, he or she is in need of a guide, or more practically a guide dog. But these are factors which are not directly concerned with the faculty of walking. Now, in the present case, the claimant in addition to suffering from blindness, is inclined to disorientation in open spaces. This, in my judgment, is like blindness, a handicap totally unrelated to her capacity or otherwise to perform the physical act of walking. I appreciate, of course, that the consequence of the claimant's tragic disability is that, although she can walk, she cannot control without assistance the direction in which she walks, she has an ability to walk, but an inability to make proper use of the faculty."

Manifestly, the House of Lords held that the ability of a person to get from point A to point B is wholly irrelevant in construing regulation 3 of the Mobility Allowance Regulations. *

7. However, the observations of the House of Lords, which are, of course, binding on all adjudication authorities, have, in our judgment, no bearing on the principles contained in R(M)2/78. There is nothing in the Lees case to indicate that their Lordships were directing their minds to anything that was said in R(M)2/78. They were only concerned with the issue whether the ability or inability to move from point A to point B was a material consideration in construing regulation 3(1). Accordingly, we are satisfied that the law, as expounded in the then Chief Commissioner's decision, still applies.

It would appear that up to this point these were the findings of all the members of the tribunal. The majority decision was as follows:-

"The tribunal by a majority decides that since the claimant is physically capable of the action of walking, one must disregard the behavioural problems, albeit resulting from the physical disability, in so far as they have the effect that the claimant in the circumstances as found above, does not walk!"

Manifestly, the majority's decision was erroneous in point of law. It is clear from R(M)2/78 that once it was established that Marks behavioural problems, which included a failure on occasion to exercise his walking powers, stemmed from a physical disability, they were necessarily relevant. In so far as the majority took the view that they should be disregarded, they erred in point of law. It follows that we must set aside their decision, and direct that the appeal be reheard by a differently constituted tribunal. That tribunal will have regard to the extent of Mark's behavioural problems in so far as they impinge on his failure to walk. It may well be that they will be concerned, not merely with his conduct on the day when they examine him, but with the history of his condition in so far as it is relevant and in particular will require to know the frequency of his failure to walk, when required so to do.

11. For completeness, we should refer to the dissenting view of the chairman. He put the matter this way:-

"Notwithstanding that the claimant does carry out the physical act of walking in the circumstances found by the tribunal, his behavioural problems which are the consequence of a physical disability and over which he has no control, prevent him from carrying out the physical act of walking and do so with such frequency and so regularly that his ability to walk out-of-doors is so limited in regard to the distance over which and the length of time in which he can make progress on foot, that he is virtually unable to walk and was so unable at the date the claim for Mobility Allowance was received.

It is the chairman's view that the House of Lord's decision in Lees does not affect the decision in R(M)2/78, or the views of the Tribunal of Commissioners as recorded in paragraph 23 of R(M)1/83 or CM/125/1983."

Whilst the chairman appears for the most part to have expressed the law accurately (although the Decision in R(M)1/83 and necessarily also the Decision in CM/125/1983 are not entirely unscathed by the Lees decision) and subject to the premise that the facts were as determined by the chairman, to have reached a decision which could properly be arrived at, nevertheless, we are not clear as to what evidence exactly he relied on, and whether it did in fact give rise to the factual position on which he based his decision. In any event, nothing turns on the point, because the matter must be referred to a new tribunal.

12. Accordingly, we allow this appeal.
